HALIFAX, Wednesday, Jan. 17.

The Royal Mail steamship Canada, Capt. Shannon, left Liverpool at 11 A. M. on the 6th inst., and Queenstown the following day.

The steamship Union had arrived at Southampton.

Nothing of importance had transpired before Sebastopol.

Negotiations.

Respecting the Conference at Vienna, the following statement: On the 28th of December, P. M., the Austrian, French and English Plenipotentiaries met for the exchange of the latter. They there drew up and signed, a kind of protocol, or rather a memorandum of the exact and precise interpretation which each Government unanimously attach to the four points.

The Austrian Minister then carried this document by stealth, to an apartment where Prince Gortschakoff was waiting, in company with Count Arnim and Baron Manteuffel, as the Plenipotentiaries of Prussia. In their presence the Austrian Plenipotentiary communicated to Gortschakoff these propositions of the Allied Powers, and called on him to state whether he was prepared to accept them without modification or reserve.

Gortschakoff answer replied that his instructions did not go so far, his orders were only to negotiate respecting the four points, but he would send off a courier, and hoped to receive further instructions. Gortschakoff expressed himself confident that the terms proposed to Gortschakoff were neither hard nor humiliating. There was no mention of the cession of Sebastopol, nor of a reduction of the Russian fleet in the Black Sea.

Gortschakoff requested fourteen days to obtain instructions from St. Petersburg, which were granted. Consequently it will be a fortnight ere anything is decided. Hostilities will continue in the meantime. It is said that the Russian interpretation differs but little from that of the Allies, thereby affording a chance, although a slight one, for peace.

Prussian Overtures.

Private correspondence, says that the Prussian notes of Dec. 20, sent to London and Paris, states that Prussia has completed the treaty made by the Powers in the three separate conferences on the 9th. Prussia says with satisfaction that the protocols of Vienna and the four points, are interpreted therein, and Prussia, although she did not take part in the conference of notes on the 9th of August, gave it her moral support. Consequently Prussia is still in diplomatic concert with the Allied Powers, and has never engaged under certain eventualities, to military cooperation. Prussia is therefore disposed to join in new stipulations of a pacific tendency. Prussia believes in the general scope of the treaty of Dec. 2, and is willing to conclude an analogous treaty, but an exact and precise interpretation of the meaning of the guarantees will be the pivot on which all of Prussia's diplomatic measures will turn.

The Italian Treaty.

It is positively stated that the treaty is actually signed between France and Austria, and it is stated that France guarantee to Austria the possession of the Italian Provinces. The London Times, however, disbelieves the existence of any such treaty.

The German Relations.

Austria has called upon Prussia to place her army on a war footing, but the Prussian semi-official journals say that Prussia will not assent to this.

The Siege.

Dec. 12—Weather frosty. False alarm at 7 o'clock in the morning. The Russians are said to be gathering and threatening the British right flank at Inkerman. The British continue to construct strong redoubts. During the day the Russians conveyed a large convoy to Sebastopol.

Dec. 13—A general alarm about 1 o'clock A. M. Heavy firing heard along the French line. An attack on the British was repulsed in three quarters of an hour.

Dec. 14—Severe fighting in the night. A sortie was repulsed by the French.

Dec. 15—Nothing important. General Adams died of his wounds.

Dec. 21—(Official from General Canrobert.)—At 2 A. M. the Russians, after having made a sortie on the third parallel of the British, who vigorously repulsed them, made a demonstration upon the centre and left of the French works. Received by a heavy fire, the Russians withdrew, pursued by the French at the point of the bayonet. Their loss was considerable.

Dec. 22—The Paris Moniteur publishes an official dispatch from General Canrobert, that notwithstanding the bad weather the siege works continue, the French and the British cooperating kindly. Scarcely a night passes without some point of the French lines being attacked by sorties, which generally cost the assailants dear. A corps of volunteers is organized to watch the approaches to the works at night; also a corps of volunteer rifle French Tirailleurs to watch by day. The French works now extend to the bottom of the Quarantine Bay. The enemy warmly dispute every inch, and the rock has to be hollowed out, yet the works advance steadily. A reconnoissance reports that there are only pickets on the left bank of the Tchernaya, the main Russian army having moved probably towards Eupatoria. The officers of Sebastopol garrison are to have each month's service reduced to a year. The Czar's sons, Michael and Nicholas, were to return to the Crimea on the 7th.

Dec. 22.—Admiral Hamelin telegraphs that 8,000 French had arrived in the camp, between the 13th and 20th, besides others at Constantinople. The Admiral says: "Attempts at sorties take place every night, but the Russians are always vigorously repulsed. The French, on the 22d, had only 1,400 wounded and 1,200 sick. The army suffered from wet, not cold."

A spurious dispatch from Odessa stated that General Liprandi, on the 25th, was attacking Balaklava. A heavy snow storm prevailed.

Dec. 25.—Gen. Canrobert writes: "We shall soon be able to take the offensive. We make good our losses more promptly and more solidly than the enemy can. We are full of confidence."

The allies, on the 26th, had to open fire. The plan of operation is: that fire was to be continued without cessation for 48 hours, and be followed by a general assault from both French and British.

A letter from the Sultan, dated Dec. 25, orders Omer Pacha to go immediately to the Crimea to concert measures with the allied Generals.

Dec. 24.—Menschikoff telegraphs that between the 20th and 24th of December nothing remarkable had occurred, with the exception of two sorties on the 21st, in one of which 11 officers and 33 soldiers were taken prisoners, and a considerable number killed. In consequence of bad weather, the siege operations progressed but slowly. According to telegraphic dispatches from both armies, they were preparing for the assault on the south side of Sebastopol.

Dec. 28.—Considerable Russian reinforcements reached Odessa. Admirals Dundas and Hamelin were at Constantinople on their way home. Admirals Lyons and Bruat are at present in command of the fleets. Lord Cardigan has left for England. General Sir De Lacy Evans has resigned in disgust.

Constantinople news says that the siege works have advanced so far that direct communication is even prevented between the garrison of Sebastopol and the Russian forces near Balaklava, to whom provisions could only be sent by roundabout paths along the coast. Although the works of attack were in a very forward state, the correspondent of the Press believes that nothing serious can be attempted against Sebastopol before the 15th of January.

The Paris Moniteur announces that the Turkish Government shows great diligence in providing supplies of ammunition and shipping repairs to the Allies.

ASIA.

Trebizonde letters of the 5th contain important news. The Russian army encamped at Kajaris had advanced to Topah Kaleh, and some consternation prevailed at Trebizonde, where the garrison was strong, but badly organized.

Dec. 23.—A strong Russian force attacked the redoubt at Kaleh. The garrison, aided by English officers and Polish generals, repulsed the attack, but their situation is still precarious.

The Porte has sent Commissioners to reorganize the army of Anatolia and Circassia.

The Russians have formed in various points of Circassia, corps of native militia with Russian officers.

Mucklen Pasha has been ordered to take the command-in-chief of the army in Asia.

The Baltic.

Important changes are being made among the higher officers of the Russian Army. General De Berg has been appointed Commander of Finland. A general consultation of the Military Authorities of the Baltic Provinces has been ordered to take place at St. Petersburg.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The returns of the Board of Trade for the month ending December 8 show a decrease in exports amounting to nearly two millions sterling.

Messrs. Morewood & Rogers, iron merchants, of London, have failed for upwards of one hundred and eighty thousand pounds sterling. Their assets are said to be large.

The motion to set aside the adjudication of Edward Oliver's bankruptcy has been further adjourned.

The London Times has created considerable excitement in England by advocating, in the boldest terms, the immediate removal of Lord Raglan from his command in the East, on the ground of incompetency.

The Times is also vigorously writing down the Ministry, and indicates that the Marquis of Dalhousie, the present Governor of India, is the only man capable of the position of Minister of War.

The Queen has written an autograph letter sympathizing with her wounded soldiers.

Barthelmy has been sentenced to death in London for murder.

Buenos Ayres dates of the 1st at Liverpool say the invading force under General Lagos was totally routed by Buenos Ayreans, and many arrests made. Business was dull.

FRANCE.

Subscriptions to the new loan were opened on the 3d of January, and good business done. Considerable specie came from England.

The French Baltic fleet is ordered to reassemble at Brest and Cherbourg. Business was very active during Christmas week in Paris. Accounts from the Industrial Districts were most satisfactory. There were increased demands for space in the Crystal Palace, and a new Gallery was ordered to the buildings. The Emperor Napoleon and Empress notify that they will not accept any presents from the French Exhibition.

SPAIN.

The Spanish Government is said to look very coldly on the English proposals to enlist soldiers for the war.

The Duke of Sevillano succeeds Columbano as Minister of Finance.

SWITZERLAND.

The new Ministry is thus composed: M. Fornerr, President and Foreign Minister; Druey, Minister of Finance; Naepf, of the Post Office; Heridier, Minister of War; Munzinger, of Commerce; Franscini, Minister of the Interior.

Mr. Fay has presented a draft of a treaty with the United States, to the Federal Council, and requested its ratification by the Swiss Federal Assembly.

A private dispatch from Berne, on the 27th, says that the British Chargé d'Affaires addressed an official demand to the Federal Council for permission to enlist Swiss. The Council is said to have replied by a formal refusal, stating that Switzerland would maintain absolute neutrality in this great war. This is thought doubtful.

AUSTRIA.

The affair of the cession of Austrian Railways to French capitalists, for a sum of two hundred millions, was definitely concluded on the 1st.

Eight Austrian batteries, of eight guns each, are to be supplied with gun cotton.

GERMANY.

The Diet of Saxony was closed on the 20th ult., by a brief speech from the throne.

The Bavarian army is now on a war footing.

The Prussian and Zollverein Governments have forbidden the exportation of horses.

The Prussian Government has also issued a notice calling attention to the law forbidding Prussians to enlist in any foreign service.

ITALY.

Three shocks of an earthquake had been felt throughout Piedmont, at 3 o'clock in the morning, on the 29th ult.

A labor riot broke out at Chiavari, in consequence of which the city was placed in a state of siege, and all arms in the hands of the rioters were ordered to be delivered up within six hours after notice.

NAVAL, Dec. 28.

The weather has been exceedingly stormy for the past three weeks, and much damage has occurred to shipping.

The "Immaculate Conception" was celebrated by a fortnight's festival, and the Neapolitan army while it lasted was placed under special benediction.

THE GIBSON AFFAIR.

Progress of the Compensation Bill.

Amendments to the Pacific Railroad Bill Rejected.

THIRTY-THIRD CONGRESS—Second Session.

SENATE.... WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 17.

Mr. Seward presented a petition from the citizens of Oneida County, New-York, asking the mediation of our Government in relation to the war in Europe. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

He also presented a petition from citizens of New-York, who served in the war of 1812, for additional bounty lands. Referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. Fessenden presented a remonstrance from a large number of citizens of Maine, praying for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave law.

Mr. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, presented a bill establishing Rock Island, Iowa, a port of delivery.

Mr. Seward presented a bill to provide for the extension of the General Post-Office—$100,000 was inserted as the amount, and the bill passed.

Mr. Walker reported, from the Committee on Claims, in favor of paying James Kunn interest on a claim certificate while he was kept out of his money among the Indians. The principal had been paid, and the bill provided for the payment of the interest from the time of presentation and refusal of the demand. Passed.

Mr. Dawson's resolution that Fridays after this week be appropriated for the consideration of the private calendar in preference to private business was then passed.

Mr. Dawson presented a bill for the removal of the obstructions in the Savannah River. Ordered to be taken up for consideration on the 30th inst.

Mr. Toombs presented a petition of 323 citizens of the District of Columbia, in favor of a return bill for the District Courts. Referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The Compensation bill was taken up. The branch under discussion relates simply to a salary of $7,500 for the Chief, and $7,000 for the Associate Justices. That part relating to members of Congress was struck out yesterday.

Mr. Seward—I thought the suggestions from the Senator from Delaware yesterday well-timed. I should like to have this bill postponed until after the passage of the Judicial Reform bill. That may diminish the labor of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and if so the compensation proposed by this bill would be neither wise nor just. There is a much stronger necessity for raising the salaries of District Judges than those of the Supreme Court Judges. That of the District Judge of Michigan is only $1,200. I cannot vote in favor of increasing the Supreme Court Judges while the compensation of District Judges is so low. Let us have a Judicial Reform bill passed, so that we can see what the duties of the Supreme Court Judges are to be, and then we can make their compensation accordingly.

Mr. Badger—I did not expect relieving the Supreme Court Judges from Circuit duty was to diminish their public labors, and that ought not to affect their compensation. If they sit here nine months instead of six, they will perform as much labor as though they traveled Circuits, and that service will be of a much higher character. With regard to the District Judges, I agree with the Senator from New-York in their being the hardest worked and poorest paid public officers.

Mr. Seward—I don't differ much with the Senator from North Carolina. Judge Nelson sits, have three months every year, and then holds Circuits in New-York which occupy his time the balance of the year. There is besides a learned and able District Judge at New-York whose labors are very arduous. These Judges ought to be better compensated.

Mr. Clayton—I do hope that we shall act upon the original bill before us, fix the salaries of those Judges. In case the Supreme Court Judges are to be relieved from Circuit duties I shall not be satisfied. I desire to know the specified duties to be performed before their salaries are fixed. I move the bill be laid upon the table for the present. Agreed to.

Mr. Rusk—I did not know, and I don't believe any body else did, what the motion was.

A motion was made to reconsider, and the Yeas and Nays called for, with the following result: Yeas, 28; Nays, 13.

The Judicial Reform bill was then taken up.

Mr. Reid was opposed to the formation of Judges, and as two terms of the Lower Appellate Courts cannot be held in one year, the country would not get adequate relief from the substitute of the Senator from Illinois. He suggested that three District Judges be authorized to hold semi-annual Courts together, and thought the separate tribunals would be diminished.

Mr. Chase submitted amendments for the entire bill. It proposes, in some degree modified, the principles of the original bill; relieves the Supreme Court Judges from Circuit duty; avoids the objections against the Intermediate Courts of Appeal; abolishes Circuit Courts and imposes their duties upon the District Courts, and provides two terms for the Supreme Court every year.

Mr. Weller thought a test vote should be taken, so that the Senate might understand how to deal with the details.

A discussion then ensued between Messrs. Butler, Geyer, Bayard and Chase, which elicited a motion from Mr. Weller, to recommit the bill with all the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill relieving the Judges of the Supreme Court from Circuit duties.

This was disagreed to by a vote of Nays, 23; Yeas, 21.

Mr. Bayard suggested the recommitment of the bill for the purpose of perfecting Mr. Douglas' amendments. After a few remarks from Mr. Butler,

Mr. Douglas moved the recommitment of the bill and all its amendments.

Mr. Rusk suggested that thereby the Committee should not consider that the Senate had decided against relieving the Judges from Circuit duties.

A vote was then taken, by agreement, on the adoption of Mr. Douglas' substitute, and resulted in a refusal to do so.

Mr. Butler moved that the bill be laid on the table. Refused.

Mr. Stuart moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the 1st of December next.

Mr. Chase was opposed to this, because he thought it important that something should be done at once.

After some remarks from Mr. Bayard, Mr. Stuart moved to postpone the consideration of the bill to 12½ o'clock to-morrow. Agreed to.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 17.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Hon. Rufus Choate, resigning his office as one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institute. He does this, not from any lack of interest in its affairs, but because of personal inconvenience to attend its business, and more particularly because of his dissent from the recent action of the Board respecting the management of the Institution, conceiving they have departed from the law.

Mr. Meredith, one of the Regents, offered a resolution to refer the letter to a Select Committee of five members, and that said Committee inquire and report whether the Smithsonian Institution has been managed and the fund expended, in accordance with the law establishing the Institution, and whether any additional legislation is required to carry out the designs of the founder, and that the Committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Stanton (one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution) moved that the letter and resolution be tabled. Disagreed to.

The resolution was then adopted by 80 against 61.

AN EXPLANATION.

Mr. Cobb made a personal explanation respecting his position on the Homestead question, and as to the privilege of franking under that system.

Mr. Bell—I wish to ask whether the gentleman is afraid "Sam" will be after him? (Laughter.)

Mr. Cobb—I have no reason to fear "Sam," he was not known in my district when I left. (Renewed laughter.)

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, on the Pacific Railroad bill. All the amendments heretofore referred or were rejected.

Mr. Perkins, of New-York, offered an amendment to appropriate three instead of twelve miles of land on each side of the proposed route. Nobody could conceive that roads could be made in less than ten or fifteen years. If there was anything of the Know-Nothing in the motion, this was a scheme to bring into the country millions of foreigners to build the roads. The great danger to our institutions is a landless posterity at no distant period. If public lands should be disposed of the next sixty years, as they have been up to this, all would be gone.

Mr. Warner, of Me., said the tendency of the amendment was to defeat the bill which he favored. The measure is Constitutional. In the extreme north, and he hoped all the sectional lines would be vanish down.

Mr. Henderson moved an amendment to have only one route—the Central. If the Government undertake the construction of three, all will be a failure.

Mr. McDougal explained—The bill is a compromise, combining Southern, Northern and Central interests. If this shall not pass no other should.

Mr. Walker moved to make one route go through Arkansas. He represented the Star-Eated Democracy, who are in favor of the scheme. He endorsed every word Mr. McDougal said except his pronunciation of the word "route," which he pronounced "root;" he was too gallant to endorse that. (Laughter.)

Mr. Smith, of Va., was surprised. The gentleman from Arkansas, who said he represented straight-out Democracy, should advocate the bill. It was contrary to all his (Mr. Smith's) notions of Democracy.

Mr. Walker moved to strike out the first section. Hooting the mixed notions of Democracy invoked by the gentleman from Arkansas in connection with the bill, he must protest against it. The bill was to grant land to speculators in violation of the Constitution. He was against land being given to build Railroads, Insane Asylums, or any transparent humbug.

Mr. McDougal said his constituents were as sound Democrats as those of the gentleman. He would not argue the Constitutional question, but simply object to the amendment.

Mr. Letcher moved to reduce the quantity of land to be granted on each side of the roads, from twelve to one mile. He believed this to be a project of speculators, from beginning to end. The principle would not come within gunshot of Virginia Democracy.

Mr. Smith, of Va., congratulated his colleague on finding out what is Democracy in the Old Dominion.

Mr. Gray opposed Mr. Letcher's amendment.

Mr. Chamberlain offered an amendment, setting aside forty miles on each side of the road, one-third to be donated to settlers, one-third for the building of the road, and the remainder to be reserved by Government for sale.

Mr. Richardson thought this would have a tendency to weaken the bill, and declared himself for one or three roads.

Mr. Cobb ineffectually sought to incorporate the first section of the bill originally introduced for a road, not north of the thirty-seventh parallel, north latitude.

Mr. Grow offered an amendment, merely giving a right of way to any company to construct the road. The Government should not do more.

Mr. Richardson could see no difference in the principle between giving a right of way and lands.

Mr. Davis, of Ind., proposed to fix the fortieth degree of north latitude for the Central route, the bill being indefinite.

Mr. Wheeler moved to strike out the enacting clause. Pending which the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

STATE AFFAIRS.

Appointment of Foreigners to Represent us Abroad.

MR. HEADLEY'S SPEECH.

FERRY ACCIDENTS.

More Power to the Common Council.

HOUSE OF REFUGE REPORT.

Special Correspondence to the N. Y. Daily Times.

ALBANY, Wednesday, Jan. 17, 1855.

At the afternoon session yesterday, Messrs. Headley, Waterbury, Mundy, O'Keefe, Aitken and others, took up the time in discussing Sam's proposition to restrict the appointment of foreigners to represent the country abroad. I send you the speech of Mr. Headley for publication, as the most comprehensive argument in favor of the resolves that were offered. It was evident that the brethren attached more importance to this event than the outsiders were disposed to consider it entitled to. The two first speakers had, evidently, prepared themselves for the occasion, and it appeared to me that they were acting under orders and in perfect concert, and that the resolves had been introduced there with a view of feeling the pulse of the House, than with reference to their applicability. What would seem to confirm this suspicion, is the fact that Mr. Beardsley, apparently, was out of the record to give utterance to his determination not to vote for any man for United States Senator who would not pledge himself to oppose the confirmation of any foreigner who might be nominated by the President as a Minister or Consul. I may be mistaken, but I considered this not only now a threat of future action, but a desire to commit the House to the views of the speaker, if they should adopt the resolves, in the advocating of which such expectations had been indulged. If all this was by concert of thought and of action, that concert has been wrecked, for I think I am not mistaken in believing that the fixing thereof will be prevented to go through without encountering any determined opposition, and without drawing from any but the first speakers an expression of opinion which will indicate their Senatorial preferences.

In the House this morning, Mr. Leigh gave notice of a bill for the prevention of accidents at Ferries. Like the bill introduced by Senator Bennett in the Upper House, it will provide for the erection and maintenance of gates on the front of all bridges leading to ferry boats.

Mr. Coleman introduced a bill in relation to the District Courts in the City of New-York. It is the same bill as introduced last year, but which failed to reach a vote on account of the late period at which it was introduced. It is a careful codification of all the laws relating to the jurisdiction of the District Courts, repealing conflicting and surplus sections, and so arranging the remainder that it can be readily referred to and understood by the profession. As the laws now exist, scattered through innumerable books, it is almost impossible to keep the run of them. If this bill passes, it will much lessen the perplexities of those practicing in the Courts, and greatly facilitate the transaction of business.

The most sensible legislative act that I have seen recorded in the passage by the House of a general bill to extend the time for the collection of taxes. This will save many an hour of the Session, and secure the present grading where it is necessary. The bill provides that whenever a collector shall, within ten days after the expiration of his warrant, pay over all moneys collected by him, and demonstrate to the satisfaction of the town authorities the necessity for an extension of his time, the town authorities may grant such extension, upon such terms as they may think proper. The Cities of New-York, Brooklyn, Albany and Troy, and the County of Kings are excepted from the operation of the bill.

A bill was introduced, providing for the location of a Law-Library somewhere in the southern tier of Counties—where, it does not determine. The subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Why not go further, if we are to go thus far, and have State Agricultural Libraries scattered hither and yon over the rural districts—State Mechanical Libraries in the cities—special libraries in the manufacturing towns—or better still, constituting miscellaneous collections, traveling from place to place. Why not put the Cosmo Library on wheels, and send it on an instructing tour of the State? For better than this, to control the expensive system of establishing special libraries in various parts of the State for the sole benefit of a class.

The Assembly passed a resolution ordering the Clerk to furnish each desk with a copy of the Revised Statutes.

NOTES OF MY TRAVELS.

[illegible]—A Bird's-Eye View—[illegible]—Florence Cloaca—[illegible]—Miscellaneously Collated from the Memoirs and Manuscripts of the Late Bramble.

[illegible] Correspondence of the N. Y. Daily Times.

Florence, Tuesday, Dec. 7, 1854.

The approach to Florence, by the Railroad, [illegible] but a momentary and partial glimpse of the city, from a distance, and affords no idea of its position and aspect. Standing on the banks of the Arno, which at this point [illegible] through a low, narrow valley, overhung by hills and mountains, it is only to be seen, to any view, by ascending one of the towers of the city, or one of the neighboring eleva-

[illegible] first impression on walking through the streets of Florence was hardly to be agreeable. They are narrow, irregular and gloomy. The magnificence of the old lofty palaces, excluding the sun, and permitting only a narrow strip of the sky to appear between their wide cornices, at once strikes the observer. The streets, though universally paved, like those of Leghorn, with flat, irregular slabs of stone, presenting for consolation and the passage of wheeled vehicles—are mostly narrow, sidewalks, and sloping towards the gutter, present, during the rainy season, a [illegible] ripple of muddy water. As I looked, from a suitable point, across the Arno, the [illegible] a pitiable resemblance to Paris from [illegible] as if I saw through a reversed [illegible] in some unhappy dream, the great [illegible] of the world's luxury and comfort [illegible] a paltry and neglected suburb.

[illegible] however, that one dull and [illegible] I took my way, afoot, through the widest of the narrow streets, [illegible] to whither it might lead me. [illegible] crossed the Ponte Carraja, I came, after a walk of twenty minutes, to one of the gates of the city. My pocket guide showed me that it led to the Porta Romana, situated at the [illegible] angle of the city. I passed [illegible] into an ascending avenue, bordered by towering cypresses, soon came to [illegible] square with a palace behind it. Upon [illegible] a body of Austrian troops un[illegible] their morning drill. [illegible] right, and pursuing a spiral [illegible] up the hills, I found myself [illegible] the slope of a cliff, the slope of which was covered with villas; from this point I had an [illegible] view of the valley of the Arno, [illegible] at my feet. Those who [illegible] with the topography of the city [illegible] understand that I had wandered [illegible] Belloguardo [illegible] this place I had the city and its environs, [illegible] a map, before me. I could trace the river, flowing from northeast to southwest, [illegible] its six bridges. There was the Cathedral of the Duomo, its dome the largest [illegible] nearly in the centre, and [illegible] monuments inter-[illegible] magnificence. I could trace every [illegible] of the town, forming in their general outline very nearly a square. The lofty [illegible] of the Palazzo Vecchio rose up by the side of [illegible] a space familiar in the immediate [illegible] of that Falstaff of Cupolas. Other [illegible] spires and antique towers, scattered here and there, told of the supremacy [illegible] once claimed over the people. The constant music of bells and [illegible], which stole faintly and sweetly out of [illegible] towers in the shade of Belloguardo, revealed to me that it had not altogether lost its influence in modern times. Nearly at my feet was the Pitti Palace, the residence of the Grand Duke, and behind it, its lawn and slope, [illegible] hill, in peaceful grotto and frown[illegible] in glassy fountains and plunging [illegible]—all mingled in enchanting variety, lay its unrivaled grounds—the Boboli Gardens—a royal playground five days out of the seven, and a public promenade on Sundays and Thursdays.

[illegible] was Florence—in a bird's-eye view—a [illegible], concise, terse little city, and [illegible] of 100,000 inhabitants. The [illegible] around was at once remarkable and charming. The season was, you will remember, [illegible] December. The weather had been wet and cold. But while I was looking upon the [illegible] the clouds broke apart and lazily floated away, dragging their gilded fringes up the mountain tops, and slowly disappearing in the distance. To the north, they disclosed the snow-capped peaks of the Morello range, the familiar barometer of the Florentines; and to the east, still more elevated and snowy [illegible]. Between these two spreading [illegible] of the Appennines, lay rolling masses [illegible] in successive slopes down to the [illegible] of the Arno.

[illegible] the mountain sides were altogether bare, or presented here and there only the variegated tints of a few faded chestnut trees; the hills between the mountains had lost their verdure, save only that the pale olive [illegible] stood slightly to the morning breeze; the mulberry plantations were stripped of their leaves, or if any remained, they were of a yellow hue; the vine and the fig tree were leafless. Yet never have I witnessed a landscape which presented a more general aspect of cheerfulness, comfort and [illegible]. From the city up to the very top of the [illegible] and indeed far away among the mountains, there was a constant succession of villas, simple or sumptuous, in the midst of [illegible] orchards; of meadows still green, of fields already sown with the next year's crop. It was literally an amphitheatre of villas, unsurpassed with contented residences, [illegible] in smiling orchards, bounded only by the mountains or by the snow-crested mountains. The sun of all this was shining a soft, golden morning, while on the listening ear came the distant bell, with familiar sounds from the farmyard, the barking of dogs, and the [illegible] of children at play. If such is the scene in December, what must it be in May?

Thus far, I have spoken only geographically of the scene. Viewed historically, the prospect was equally remarkable. There, to the north, was Fiesole, going back to the Etruscans, and still presenting Cyclopean vestiges of its Pelasgic population; the heights of San Miniato, an ancient fortress, commanded by Michael Angelo in the defence of Florence; the Torre del Gallo, renowned as the site of Galileo's Observatory and the residence of Milton; alluded to in his description of Satan's palace—Villa Mosti, the country seat of the Medici family, and celebrated alike in the dark pages of [illegible] and the poetic outbursts of Byron; Valombrosa, not actually in view, but its lofty peaks suggestively over other hills, on the verge of the horizon; with a score of other spots, all famous in story, and in the annals of poetry and art. But for the present, I pass passing over the historical associations connected with these scenes. I have wished simply to map Florence in the mind of the reader, and to give him his share of the balm of this December morning, and of the rustic sights which [illegible] its immediate environs.

On the way [illegible] small matters of interest occur to beguile the time, alike new to me, fresh from Paris, and to you, detained by business at New-York. Here is a man sweeping the streets. He has a small wooden [illegible] the handle of which is attached to a strap passing around his waist. His body does the pulling, and he has his two hands free. Every now and then the shaft runs into him, behind, without seeming either to annoy or to hurt him; he has probably grown callous to the infliction. In one hand, he holds a wooden shovel, and in the other a broom which would do honor to the First Witch in "Macbeth." The centre of the broom portion is cut out so that the two ends straddle, and as he pushes it before him it reaches out to an amazing distance on either side, swabbing up vast extents of the tessellated pavement. This agent of "salubrity," as the French would call him, is efficient and satisfactory. The streets are narrow, the vehicles are few, and the surface hard and smooth. All things considered, the pavement of Florence may be set down as one of the best in the world, disagreeable to the eye, but durable, and offering to a well-sprung carriage something of the smoothness of railroad locomotion.

Here we are at the river. The street that borders its northern bank is graphically called "Along the Arno." On the opposite side the backs of the houses touch the water, presenting a very unpleasant spectacle to the beholder. One feels like exclaiming with the Irish Lion to Mrs. Figgig's servant, "How dare you turn that part of your person towards me, Sir!" at the same time that he spanks him vigorously with a loose board. This view of the back windows and unsightly out-house projections, just at the most favorable point for a prospect of Oltrarno architecture, is the most offensive thing in Florence. Wrong side out and hind side before are carried here to their very ideal. Stove-pipes burst out at numerous points, pursue an angular course the proper distance for persuading a draft, and terminate in the usual two-pronged vent. Chimney tracks are easily traced by the bulge they produce in the exterior surface. Clothes are hung out to dry. Children's heads are combed out of the window into the river. Horrible port-holes, the uses of which may be imagined but not described, are pierced at various intervals in this hideous back-front. The muddiest river in Europe washes its slimy base. This, a week ago a lazy stream, occupying but one-tenth part of its bed, has lately been swollen by the rains, and has become a tortuous, devastating torrent. It is a popular prejudice that the Arno is a beautiful sheet of water. Nations have been misled by the poetry of its name. Compared to the Connecticut, it is a sewer with the lid taken off, and its contents, of a sago, tapioca consistency, exposed to the view.

As we pass along, we notice a house numbered 5,710. This seems a high figure for even the longest street to reach; and, upon investigation, we find that the whole city is numbered right through, every street forming part of the sequence. The only professed advantage of this system is, that if you know the number only of a house, without the street, an expert coachman will at once conduct you thither. But the result of so puzzling a practice is, that people learn other methods of remembering and pointing out particular houses—saying of them that they are opposite such a café, or at such a corner, or form such an angle.

We notice, too, at every door, four or five iron bell-handles, marked from one to five; and we see that there is no porter or concierge to inform the visitor what story such and such a person inhabits. It is, therefore, a necessity to know the story before-hand. If the street door is shut, and your friend occupies the second story, you pull bell No. 2. It rings up stairs in his kitchen, and his servant, laying hold of a rope communicating with the latch or the bolties, opens the street door. On reaching the second floor, you find the servant, already forewarned of your approach, prepared to admit you. This custom is, however, an embarrassing one, and a portion of the better mansions, and especially those of modern construction, are furnished with a porter's lodge. The porter is a real necessity, for convenience, though he has been known to turn spy, to read your newspaper first, to keep back your letters, to send away your visitors, and to snore instead of pulling the rope.

Just about where we are now is a shop of a character such as you meet in country villages, but rarely in a European capital—a variety store. Mr. Robert Townsend keeps, as he says, everything in his line—and this line is as comprehensive as the Equator and the meridian of 180° west. He is at once grocer, fruiterer, wine merchant, perfumer, apothecary; he keeps hardware, tinware, earthenware, dry goods, salt fish, friction matches, Windsor soap, ribbons, bandanna handkerchiefs and whale oil. Mr. Townsend, who seems to be the successor of some other Townsend, is six feet three inches high, and his manner is such that you seem to have insulted him at each inquiry you make. His silent attitude of injured mercantile dignity, when I asked him if he had any Smyrna figs, has decided me to make my purchases elsewhere in future.

However, it was well to have traded a little at Townsend's, if for nothing else but to get some small change in return, and investigate the Tuscan copper currency. The cent is named a crazia, and may be aptly described by calling it a metallic rose-leaf. It is a very delicate film of copper mixed with silver, and may be bent double between vigorous fingers and thumbs. If it ever had an inscription upon it, the impress has long since been effaced; the crazia is as innocent of stamp as anybody's finger-nail. Then there is the two-crazia piece, which would make a capital wadding for rifles, to shoot allies with in the Crimea. The crazia is the eighth part of a paul—and this paul is the principal coin in the currency. The price of an article may be 20 paul, or as ten pauls make a scudo or dollar, 2 scudi or dollars. You thus have an opportunity of varying agreeably your financial conversation. What an attractive license it would be in America to be able to give, at the price of an article, two eagles, four half eagles, ten dollars, eighty shillings, or one hundred ten cent pieces. That is the Tuscan system—and moreover, they have four words for dollar, all of which you are liable to hear in your very first commercial interview. Your cash wants so many "moneys" a month. This location would seem to be borrowed from "Shylock." A "money" is a dollar, and so is a scudo, a francescone, and a piastre.

One item of musical news to conclude. Miss Hensler, of Boston, makes her first appearance at La Scala, in Milan, on the 26th of December, in either the "Sonnambula" or "Linda." The prospects continue to be, as I have always represented them, brilliant. Her voice goes up, improving, and her powers of execution seem to expand illimitably, under her excellent tuition and her own conscientious practice. At a private party given lately near Como, she was asked to sing, and encore followed encore, till she had sung eleven times. There is great curiosity and impatience still in Milan for her debut, as she is quite extensively known as l'Americana; the salary she is to receive being unusually high for a debutante, and the musical authorities of the city having spread favorable accounts of her abilities. Were there any means of communication between Florence and Milan, I should make a point of being present on the occasion; but I would as soon cross the Atlantic as travel from one Italian Capital to another, though only two hundred miles apart. However, I think I may promise you the earliest intelligence of the result of this, the first noticeable operatic entertainment offered by an American in Europe.

SPANISH AFFAIRS.

A Sort of Coup d'Etat—No Union of Spain and Portugal—No Spanish Troops to go to the Crimea—Spain Does Not Join the Allies—Her Disposition Toward Us.

Special Correspondence of the N. Y. Daily Times.

London, Friday, Dec. 29, 1854.

The Spanish Government has made a sort of coup d'état, and a successful one, at least for the moment. The affair is quite of the pantomime category, and would have done for a boxing-night piece in some of the minor theatres of London. The honorable constituents received on the 21st a mysterious invitation for a confidential sitting during the night in the assembly hall. The billets had no signature, and told little more than a slight intimation that Government wanted to consult with its supporters. All the Dons went, wrapped up, no doubt, in their classic mantles, and with their brave hearts beating as if they were to follow the well-known duenas of Spanish melo-drama to the unknown residence of some love-stricken Donna. Orense himself was present, and when all were seated, O'Donnell rose to explain the mystery. Confiteurs omnes, intentique ore tenebant. He confessed at once, that the anonymous invitations originated with the Cabinet. Of the reason of that underhand convocation, he said, however, nothing, nor was he asked for it, so natural it seemed evidently to be to all the august legislators. The national character saw there nothing extraordinary; on the contrary, it would have been, perhaps, out of order to be asked by letters bearing a signature, to a meeting at mid day. A prosaic way, surely, to transact business. Well, O'Donnell then said that matters could not go on as they did. The Cabinet must have a compact majority, or the Cortes must look for other ministers. The ministerial programme was known,—if that met with the approbation of the honorable members they must say so, and then set up to their words by remaining the united supporters of Governmental measures already proposed and to be proposed. The General complained of the wavering, and even fault-finding conduct of those who profess to be the supporters of the administration. He went even to personalities, and accused Messrs. Olozaga and Manos of hostile demonstrations against those who saved the country, and who are now treated like enemies by the very faction they served most. This harangue, haughty and bitter, personal and insolent, raised a perfect storm, and recriminations flew in all directions. The two above-named gentlemen threw back the accusations, and called the Cabinet ungrateful. Mr. Manos was particularly vehement, and spoke in a strong Progressista way, declaring his readiness to support Espartero's Cabinet; but, at the same time, refusing to promise any support for the absurd financial measures of Señor Collado, and declaring, moreover, his resolution to oppose certain parts of the Cabinet programme, especially the one concerning the future constitution of the Senate. He also made no secret of his distrust of Moderado men and measures, and had no confidence in any Administration of which Espartero should not be the Chief. There was a great deal of altercation. The storm being, however, somewhat stilled, 147 members adopted the resolution, "that the meeting approves of the spirit and essence of the programme of the Government, on condition that in its execution the tendencies manifested and pointed out by the discussion which took place, be followed." The Democrats and many extreme Progressistas left the meeting as soon as they were told of the reasons that led to its convocation. The remaining 147 are thus to form that compact majority of the Congress, which the Government is in much need of. So far the success. It may, however, be doubted that that majority will prove very water-proof in Parliamentary storms involving party interests,—I don't say principles, of which there is little. I almost forgot to say that Espartero was shining by his absence in that consultation of "night thoughts."

You have often heard of the Union of Portugal with Spain in a whole empire, and it is even said by the European Know-Nothings that England is in favor, and, in fact, nurses the idea. This union, however, is a mere dream for the present—a dream that may become a reality, but after the republicanization of the whole Peninsula. It is, at all events, absurd to think that the British Court would wish for a Pyrenean Empire, be it as a monarchy or a republic. The future of this question, as in reality the future of Spain's welfare, rests with the Democrats, and I hear that they have taken the matter seriously in their hands, at Lisbon as well as at Madrid. Two sister associations are started under the name, "League Hispaño Lusitanian," and a constant exchange of views takes place between the two capitals. Should the object which they specially work for not be attained, the results of such an intercourse of the Democrats of the two countries cannot fail to be of an important sort. And this is, at least for the present, the point of practical view in which this double association merits to be noticed and judged. There were some Carlist troubles without great importance, and speedily suppressed. If the Cabinet at Madrid had nothing to fear but from that side, it might feel safe. The elements of trouble and revolt are, however, in its own insanity, indecision, and heedless tendency, to compromise all and everything. The bill for the reduction of the army to 70,000 men has been voted. The British Government speculates, I hear, on levying a foreign legion in Spain from among the soldiery, to be discharged in consequence of the above-mentioned reduction. General Prim has been mentioned to me as the one likely to be put in command of that legion. It is not true that the Western Powers have addressed any request to the Cabinet of Madrid to the effect of Spain's sending a contingent of troops to the East. The Allies answer aware of her inability to do any such thing; and a diplomatic request, they, perhaps, be addressed, for the mere prospect of a certain refusal, to a State of some importance, under certain circumstances, but certainly not to Spain at this moment. But it is true, that Espartero's Cabinet has been asked to join the Allies by the accession to the treaty, which is open to all signatures. It would have been an alliance of mere demonstration, negative rather than positive. Espartero excused himself, however, from acceding to even such a treaty. You may equally discredit all the rumors, once more raised, about engagements entered into in respect to Cuba's protection by a combined squadron of the Three Powers. Mr. Soulé has asked, I am assured, for some explanation of the Cabinet's views and intentions, and he was assured by Espartero himself, that "as to filibustering expeditions, Spain relies solely on her own means of protection, and as to an enterprise of a different sort, she relies beyond those same means; also, on the good faith and the friendly intentions of the United States." He emphatically denied the existence of any underhand negotiations with the two naval powers, in regard to the guaranteed question.

What Causes the Discouragement of Emigrants—Let the Truth be Known, &c.

Correspondence of the New-York Daily Times.

Westport, Mo., Friday, Dec. 29, 1854.

As a Kansas emigrant, and one terribly humbugged but not disheartened, I would avail myself of your widely-circulated journal in the honest endeavor to encourage emigration to the West, and, at the same time, avert many unnecessary evils connected therewith.

There is no reason whatever for the inconvenience and actual suffering I have known in the West this season. Nor is there any necessity for the fanning reports and Eldorado schemes got up by speculators and others to force emigration. The soil is rich enough, and the whole country sufficiently beautiful in itself to induce population without exaggeration. A more magnificent expanse of country I never imagined than this same Kansas Territory. Boundless plains, dotted here and there by scenic copses, and watered by pure crystal streams and sparkling rivulets, extend on either side as far as the eye can reach. The soil, too, is of the richest, darkest earth, with hardly an acre that cannot be improved by the hand of man, while the whole country, though deficient in timber, is supplied by the bounteous hand of Nature with inexhaustible mineral resources. It is singularly and providentially favored in this respect. Evidences of coal are being discovered throughout the Territory, and they augur an inexhaustible supply.

And yet, despite these truths—despite the enthusiasm that prevails in the East, and along the road, even up to the desired point—despite the united shout of emigrants, "Kansas forever"—despite the thousands who have come from the East—what is the result? Not over 300 votes cast for a Free Soil Delegate to Congress at the late election; the return and dissatisfaction even the country of fourfifths of the "master current of emigration;" the discouragement and loud murmurings of all that remain without hope of return. There are not half a dozen huts on the soil chosen by the American Settlement Company, although several hundred have started for this point. One party of over 200 persons from Pennsylvania, under the charge of Mr. Alderdice, has been entirely disbanded. They arrived in the Territory expecting to find reception buildings erected for their accommodation; instead of which they roamed over the prairies in the vain and fruitless search for the city site, so highly extolled in the printed circulars. These papers and circulars, describing the beautiful situation and superior advantage of the site chosen for the proposed city, were actually printed and distributed before the Locating Committee had made their contemplative tour. The place therein designated "as being for many reasons a choice spot" is synonymous with Council Grove, which, by treaties made in good faith, is perpetually secured to the Indian Reserve; and, consequently, not liable to pre-emption or sale. The grossly exaggerated statements of this Company, and others equally imaginative, must tend to stem the current of emigration to the West, by destroying all confidence in the efficacy and representations of aid societies generally. Emigrants should know just what they will have to endure; no man should emigrate West unless prepared for toil and hardships of the severest kind. And he must have some little money to start upon. His claim must sooner or later be paid for, oxen and farming implements be procured, a house or log cabin built, and provisions laid in until he can harvest his own crop. This is the one great mistake with emigrants; they arrive in the territory without any means of support; and here, at first, it is all outlay and no profit.

There are substantial and energetic men in the States, who, if they could rely upon the statements of these aid societies, would soon people the Territory of Kansas; but, with expectations raised to the highest pitch by false reports of the country, they emigrate, and, finding themselves deceived, turn back without making an effort or even registering a claim. If these pseudo-aid societies would but confine themselves to facts, these very men would come prepared to meet the difficulties which unforeseen frightens them home. Speak the truth; tell a man that he must have money to buy logs on boards, if he can procure them at all; that he must depend for sustenance, not upon game, but beef, and pork, and wheat, as in the States, and that he must pay an exorbitant price for these necessaries; that the territory is sadly deficient in timber, and that all the wood claims are taken up; state these facts, and he will come prepared to encounter and surmount every obstacle. The West requires men of untiring energy and indomitable perseverance—men who will not shrink from toil and hardships; men who will invent an equivalent for a necessary that cannot be obtained. Such men, and such men only, should emigrate West.

As regards Council City, the site has at last been determined upon and is indeed a fine one, and the surrounding country beautiful in the extreme. The ground selected is situate on the "Divide," directly on the Santa Fé road; and for richness of soil and magnificence of scenery cannot be surpassed. But there is no timber; and every scanty wood claim has been staked out by the Locating Committee for themselves and friends. In a country so scarce of timber, and especially at Rumboe Council City, every scrap of timber ought to have been secured by the Company for the mutual advantage of the settlers, and not for the Company itself. It is a piece of imposition to tell people that there is plenty of timber, as the American Settlement Company has certainly done, and, when emigrants arrive at, and ferret out the place, to find that the "plenty of timber" has been secured by the Company for their individual aggrandisement.

The Emigrant Aid Society of Massachusetts is progressing finely in their settlement on the Kaw, or Kansas River; the scenery, for ten miles around the city site, has been already secured by claimants; they have a saw and grist mill in active operation, with sufficient timber along the Kaw River for building and other purposes. The settlement of Douglass also has a saw-mill in process of erection; but the Council City men look cranky; and they misrepresent things, either through ignorance, or with a determination to deceive. They can never expect to retain settlers until they learn to confine themselves to the truth.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

CORNELL'S PRIMARY GEOGRAPHY, designed for the Use of Schools, in Series of Short Lessons. By S. S. Cornell. New-York: D. Appleton & Co. Small Quarto, of 96 pages.

We have carefully examined this work, prepared by a lady of much experience in our Common Schools, and have seldom been more pleased with it. It claims to have sundry original and distinctive features, as follows:

First—Only those branches of Geographical Science that admit of being brought fully within the comprehension of the youthful beginner, have been introduced into the greater number of the series.

The doctrine of the motto on the title page is fully carried out: "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear."

Second—At the same time that the memory is called into exercise, the understanding is enlightened by copious and appropriate illustrations.

"Appropriate!" That is a curiosity in a geography, we must say, but for the most part the pictures in this book are "illustrations," and "appropriate" ones.

Third—The youthful student is put in possession of a simple and easy method of memorizing the contents of a map, by means of a carefully systematized set of questions.

Not having tried it, we are unable to say how far this claim is justified by the method adopted. However, any method may be made serviceable by a zealous teacher.

Fourth—The work is so arranged, and the science so imparted, that teachers, parents, trustees, and others, may satisfactorily ascertain, at any stage of the pupil's advancement, what he knows of the science—

—Which will be of some service to School Committees—not of very great to parents.

Fifth—The mechanical execution of the work is equal or superior to that of any other school-book extant, and will commend itself.

The Appletons publish it.

Sixth—The system pursued throughout the entire series, is calculated to save at least one-half the time heretofore required for the purpose, and at the same time, secure to the student greater and permanent results.

That is saying a great deal. Geography seems to have been taught generally not as a science but as a collection of facts, and they not very skillfully arranged either. Miss Cornell has proposed a system of teaching it. It certainly promises to be of very great value.

Bangs & Brothers continue their importations of Bohn's excellent editions. Of those named above, all classical students and readers of "standard books" will most delight to lay hands on this translation of Xenophon. The attempts of the translators was to be as literal as is consistent with clearness and perspicuity—an attempt which has been eminently successful. The text followed is that of Dindorf. This constitutes the second volume of Bohn's edition of Xenophon's Works. A chronological table and full index enhance its value.

The seventh volume of Cowper's Works contains his translation of the Iliad entire. Four elegant steel engravings illustrate the poem. Another volume concludes the "Cowper."

Prior's Life of Burke is too well known to need more than an announcement of this cheap, yet excellent edition. A portrait and an index are given in it.

Moll Flanders made a great stir in her day. We were curious to see her story again, though, to say truth, we shall not recommend it to our young friends. Written to-day, every critic in the land would cry out for its expunging or suppression.

The History of the Devil is one of De Foe's most famous books. It is exceedingly curious, sharp, learned and suggestive. These two form the third volume of Bohn's edition of De Foe's Works.

Here is an assorted lot of books for the young folks. Country Life is a pleasant story, with pretty pictures. The Catacombs is a good Sunday School book, and worthy a place in the Common School Libraries. Thackeray's Rose and Ring is a handsome book to look at, and the sketches are laughable, but the letter press does not amount to much. The others tell their own stories in their titles.

CHEMICAL ATLAS; OR, THE CHEMISTRY OF FAMILIAR OBJECTS. By Edward L. Youmans. New-York: D. Appleton & Co. Quarto, 100 pages.

Mr. Youmans has hold of a worthy idea,—that to reach the mind the shortest route is through the eye, and that what is seen as well as heard, and skillfully illustrated as well as described, will be most likely to take up its permanent residence within call of memory. In this Atlas the plan of the Chemical Chart, published some years ago, is carried out far more fully. It exhibits the general principles of Chemistry in a series of colored diagrams, accompanying them with explanatory essays, which make exceedingly simple to the student and interesting to all, the first principles of the science. It is because it is so genuine to master those threshold truths, that Chemistry with its beautiful laws is so little known, except generally, and by its uncouth nomenclature and more popular experiments to admiring people. We owe thanks to Mr. Youmans for making so pleasant this theory and dessert part of the road. Teachers will especially delight to pay their dues easily and place before their classes this Atlas.

The authors of Beauties and Achievements of the Blind purpose to travel in the South, offering their volume for sale, as a means of earning an honest livelihood. They intend to put the contents of the volume into raised print for the use of their "fellow-sufferers for lack of sight," as soon as the profits will permit.

The American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge for the year 1855, has appeared from the press of Phillips, Sampson & Co., and reaches us through Ivison & Phinney. It seems to be fully equal to its predecessors in accuracy and abundance of statistical information. A very valuable volume.

The Metropolitan Catholic Almanac and Laity's Directory for 1855, has been published by Lucas Brothers, of Baltimore. It forms a volume of 300 pages and is full of information which is essential to the Catholic's appreciation of the state of his own Church in the United States.

Prof. Taylor Lewis, of Union College, has a work in press, of which the following is the title: The Six Days of Creation; Or, The Scriptural Cosmology, with the ancient idea of the plurality of Time-Worlds, in distinction from Worlds in Space.

Putnam's Portraits is the title of a small press designed to make ridiculous those "mutual admirers," as he esteems them, whose portraits look out from the several numbers of Putnam's Monthly. Poorly done.

From our correspondent, Columbus, Jan. 15.

A distressing affair occurred in front of the National Theatre, on last Saturday evening, and as it is likely, from the circumstances under which it happened, the responsibility of the young man involved, and their numerous friends, to obtain a very great publicity, we have been at considerable to procure the facts of the case. The parties to the affair were two young men, named Hilario H. Ormsbee and Thomas Jennings.

Mr. Jennings is a son of Mr. M. O. Jennings, the merchant tailor of Main-street. He was formerly one of the chief clerks in the office of the National Telegraph. They are both young men of prepossessing manners, and have many friends.

Jennings is reported to have had some fear of the reputation of a lady-killer, and, from the generous vanity of wishing to be thought a dashing, is said to have been in the habit of [illegible] intentions that he had accomplished. How much there may be in this imputation we do not know.

It seems that he was acquainted with a Miss Eckert, to whom Ormsbee had been for some time paying his attentions, and whom, about four weeks ago, he (Ormsbee) married.

In conversation with some of his youthful associates, Jennings boasted that he had on one occasion got Miss Eckert (now Mrs. Ormsbee) to take a buggy-ride with him, and that he had, at some hotel in the country, passed her off as his wife; staid all night and returned to the city next day. These stories had nothing by their [illegible] one person to another until they reached the ears of Mr. Ormsbee, who is of a highly [illegible] organization, and was stung to madness by them.

The very soul of high honor and feeling, he was shocked at the imputations on the honor of his wife, and at most grievous misrepresentations of Jennings. The latter was standing by the stove in the lobby of the National Theatre at 10 o'clock on Saturday night, when Ormsbee came up, tapped his shoulder and asked him to step to the door.

He did so, and as they got outside the house, Ormsbee asked him if he had boasted in public that he had seduced Miss Eckert. He emphatically replied that he had, and Ormsbee, drawing a pistol, placed it to Jennings' face and fired. The ball shattered Jennings' nose, tore his face badly and lodged in the head.

Deputy Marshal Gray was standing within a few feet of the parties when the affair occurred, and at once arrested Ormsbee, who made no resistance, and only said, "I don't care if I am hung for it; he said he seduced my wife." The wounded man was carried across the street to the Woodruff House, and the medical aid of Drs. Wood and Potter procured.

It was found that the ball, which had been of large size, had entered the left side of the upper lip, tearing and fracturing extensively the bones of the nose and face. The ball was not found, as any attempt to probe it would have produced a profuse gushing with blood and the consequence of opened. Should Jennings recover, which is hardly possible, he will be horribly mutilated.

Ormsbee was taken to the Hamilton-street Station-house, where he remained and appeared for some time in a state of insensibility. The meeting between him and his wife was deeply affecting.

Yesterday morning he was taken to the Ninth-street Station-house, where some hundreds of our most respectable citizens called yesterday to see him. Many also called at the Woodruff House to learn the condition of Mr. Jennings, who also has a host of friends, who think this distressing affair grew from indiscretion and tale-bearing rather than from deliberate malice on his part.

The father of Mr. Ormsbee, who resides at Springfield, was sent for immediately, and arrived last night. Messrs. Cowdrey, Hayes and Rogers will act as Mr. Ormsbee's attorneys. At 11 o'clock yesterday, Judge Brooks stated that if there was a probability of Mr. Jennings' recovery, he would hold Mr. Ormsbee to bail in $5,000 bonds for his appearance to answer the charge that might be preferred against him.

At one time Mr. Jennings was supposed to be dying from strangulation, and Dr. Wood was sent for. He removed a bone from the throat of Mr. Jennings, who then became easier.

Mr. Ormsbee is still under arrest, as Judge Brooks, after a consultation with the physicians in attendance on Mr. Jennings, continued not to accept bail. Mr. Jennings was comfortable yesterday, and Dr. Wood had some hopes of his recovery.

Arrest of a Man Charged with Murder Committed Ten Years Ago—A Revived Rebellion—Sent to the Sing-Sing Penitentiary.

From the Troy Whig, Jan. 16.

In the Summer or early Fall of 1844, one Peter Martin purchased of Mr. Van Rensselaer, the patroon, a farm in the town of Grafton, in this county, and soon after went on the land to cut wood.

Elisha Smith, of the same town, was employed by Martin to cart the wood from the lot as opportunity with M., who was driving another team with loads of wood. While thus engaged, on Thursday, the 19th of December, 1844, when near the house of Foster Mason, on the turnpike, Martin and Smith were accosted by a party of about fifty men, disguised as Indians. They entered the house by the bite and ordered the men to stay.

Smith resisted, and jumped off his load with an axe in his hands, which he brandished in self-defence. He was immediately seized by "the Indians," who formed a ring around. Upon his offering further resistance, one of the "Indians" drew a pistol and shot him down. Smith fell mortally wounded, and was taken to a neighboring house, where he soon after died. Previous to his being taken to the house the Indians dispersed.

The murder caused great excitement at the time throughout the State. It was thought to be the commencement of high-handed outrages secretly determined upon by the Anti-renters to attain their ends. Efforts to ferret out the men who fired the pistol led to the arrest and examination of several persons, all of whom were discharged.

The examination of the accused lasted nearly two weeks, before the Police Court of this city. The District Attorney, however, was much against his will, finally induced to admit evidence to the apprehension of the guilty party, or likely to prove satisfactory.

A personal or neighborhood quarrel has recently occurred in Grafton, the principal parties to which are Benjamin Allen and Joseph A. Martin, Martin charges that Allen is the man who murdered Smith. Upon his affidavit, Justice Rogers of Lansingburgh, last week issued a warrant for the arrest of Allen.

He was brought to this city on Saturday and by officers Battershall and Wells, and lodged in jail. He is about 60 years of age. We know nothing of his "antecedents." Ex-District Attorney Lottridge has been retained as Allen's counsel.

John Sanborn, the Fugitive, Declares he Leaves the Country—His Prodigious Wrongs.

From the Boston Telegraph, Jan. 16.

The following is an extract from a private letter from a gentleman in Worcester:

"It appears to be not secret here, that John Jackson is in this city, and not in Canada. His friends advise him to remain here, if he can find work, and he is disposed to do so, being a man of Herculean strength, and not easily frightened. Besides, you know, we have taken the ground that 'Worcester is Canada to the slave.' At any rate I have heard men express the hope, that if Sanborn is anxious for Mr. Jackson's society, he will come to Worcester and enjoy it."

This statement as to Jackson's great strength and courage, is not exaggerated. We have had a conversation with one of the men in whose employment he was at the time of the search for him. This gentleman says that Jackson would take up a barrel of flour with his hands and shoulder it with the greatest ease. He is also exceedingly agile, having on one occasion, in the store, jumped eleven feet, from a standing position, and remained standing at the end of his leap.

Gentlemen having left the University came to Melbourne to make a fortune, and in a few weeks are found sweating blocks of stones studying stone-cracking."

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

Proceedings in the Assembly on Mr. Headley's Resolution to Exclude Foreign-born Citizens from such Service.

IN ASSEMBLY—Wednesday, Jan. 17.

Having called up his resolution, Mr. HEADLEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In offering the resolution which has just been read, I wish, at the outset, to disclaim all intention of proscribing any class of men, or of drawing any invidious distinction entire base and odious calumny, unworthy with the respect and regard we owe to my fellow-citizens. Nor do I office it to appeal to prejudice, or to excite regard and passion. I disclaim, sir, any intention of criticising on the present Administration, or wishing to hold me a party one; for I do not consider it of the high duties of Administration in this country, but only as having yielded, to a dangerous point, a policy which they, by some fate or other, characterized when it was pursued by Administrations. Nor do I do it to excite prejudice, but to insure present danger, and prevent, if possible, a great and threatened danger in the future. I do not think there is an American then I would prefer to see in the place of any other land, nor advocate a system which I do not believe to be the correct, very, and the best one for our Government to pursue. I believe it to be highly necessary for me to refer to the exciting cause which the recent appointment of so many distinguished citizens of foreign birth has produced, nor to the circumstances which their conduct has occasioned. A great and powerful nation, with two friendly powers has, by a vote of the people, and so certain are we of maintaining the peace of Europe, that with the arrival of every steamer we expect to hear of some new difficulty which will result in the recall of our Minister, American born, to some place of inferior importance to two native-born citizens, who, by a change of the political tide, have been appointed to the place which their conduct has occasioned. A country, which, in the last year, has been at war with two powerful nations of such slight moment that it should be disregarded for mere political amusement, or to avoid the charge of proscription! Sir, we have come to stand on an equal footing with the nations of Europe, and every year, by the increase of our commerce and the importance of our interests, the number of our friends and the importance of our alliances, American born, to represent us at the Court of Spain, or

MARKET REPORTS.

Weekly Review of the Dry Goods Trade.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 17—5 P. M.

The Dry Goods business exhibits very little signs of life. The market does not continue to be the most modestly disposed; and is not generally expected to improve much for some time to come. It is understood that there is a large amount of goods destined among retailers in the interior of the country, for which no provision could be made during the Fall; and it is generally believed they will be compelled to restrict the transactions in this direction for the present season; no purchase seemed disposed to buy freely, especially in such direct as these, which they have supplies on hand to close out. The unfavorable character of the accounts of our trade, which have been and are doing all in their power to keep their purchases for the spring trade within the limits which circumstances absolutely dictate, thus giving no view to prosperity in matter this, at least a sad, and a very gloomy character's week. Home manufacturers have to do for the best, from their production, that there is not enough to pay any profits from the business, and that the only remedy for the evil is a curtailment in the production. MERCHANTS' BANK, BURLINGTON, VT., Jan. 12, 1855.—For several months past, Mr. John Thompson, a broker in New-York, who publishes a bank note reporter, has most unwarrantably this institution, for which he has been prosecuted for libel.

Although these attacks were unfounded, and greatly injurious to the Bank, no suit could with safety be brought against Mr. Thompson, who is fully convinced that Mr. Thompson was acting in good faith in the matter. He has repeated his attack in his Reporter the 4th January, inst., in an article which is grossly untrue, and so may, perhaps, continue his attacks, with the hope of indemnifying the suit now pending against him.

Under these circumstances, we deem it due to the public, as well as to ourselves, to say that this Bank is perfectly sound, beyond all question, and that it has at all times redeemed its circulation promptly. We, therefore, request and at the Suffolk Bank, in Boston, where it is the practice of the New-England Banks to make their redemptions, and the public may rest assured that it will continue promptly to do so.

BIRTHDAY OF FRANKLIN.

Anniversary of the N. Y. Typographical Society.

Addresses of R. W. Weir, Esq., Hon. Reuben Brooks and Col. Thomas B. Thorpe.

The 149th anniversary of the birthday of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the patriot, philosopher and printer, was celebrated at the Tabernacle last evening, under the auspices of the New-York Typographical Society, with appropriate ceremonies. At an early hour in the evening every available seat in the Tabernacle was occupied, and when the hour for the commencement of the ceremonies had arrived, several hundred persons were standing in the aisles and in the rear of the [illegible]. There were not less than four thousand persons present on the occasion.

At 7½ o'clock, Mr. FRANCIS A. TEAL, Esq., President of the Typographical Society, appeared on the stand accompanied by his Honor the Mayor, the orators of the evening PETER COOPER, Esq., Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, and the Vice Presidents of the Society.

Mr. TEAL introduced to the assemblage Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor of New-York, who was to preside on the occasion.

His Honor Mayor WOOD then arose, amid loud and reiterated applause, and said:

I feel highly honored for having been selected as the presiding officer on this occasion—an occasion which must certainly strike us as exceedingly interesting, called together as we are to do honor to the memory of one of the first of American patriots, as he was the first of modern practical philosophers, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. (Applause.) There is another object, ladies and gentlemen, which I hope you will also appreciate, which is to aid in the extension and improvement of the Printers' Free Library, for the dissemination of useful knowledge, I may say, throughout the world.

Rev. LEONARD W. BACON pronounced an appropriate prayer.

The Choir, under the direction of Mr. GEORGE ANDREWS, then executed, in a highly creditable manner, the following Opening Ode, written for the occasion by FRANKLIN J. OTTARSON, Esq., of the New-York Tribune:

When o'er the moral world the pall
That told Religion dead, was flung,
And Superstition's chilling thrall
On God's devoted altars hung,
Then, in the fullness of the time,
There flamed above the fallen earth
Thy glorious star, whose light sublime
Proclaimed the promised Saviour's birth.

A thousand years had waned away,—
The world in mental midnight rolled—
The Age of Darkness and Decay
From memory crushed the Age of Gold,
When, from the void of ignorance,
Flashed out the lightning of the Press—
A heaven-created radiance—
To warn, to comfort and to bless.

And, as from land to land it flew
The longing people blessed the light;
For with it, Freedom o'er them threw
The magic shield of Human Right:
It showed the Tyrant's cowing sword;
It lighted up the Bigot's den;
Hurled down the Kings whom fools adored,
And raised the mass from Slaves, to Men.

Hail to the Press! Forever on,
Its mind-liberating march will be,
Till it shall bring to every one
Of Adam, light and liberty.
Wrought by the tireless arm of Steam,
The Lightnings to its service given,
So may it speak as shall become
The mightiest power under Heaven.

Mr. R. A. WEST then came forward and congratulated the Mayor as presiding, not over a Common Council, but over a combination of intellect-producers and light-diffusers. To illustrate the idea of the power of the press, he had taken a sheet of blank paper, which, as it were, saw nothing, felt nothing, and "knew nothing." (Applause.) It was Native American, although it was true that the rags may have been imported, and "naturalized" at that. (Laughter.) But manufactured, and dull, and black as it was, the printer's devil would turn it into an angel of light in less than five minutes. Why, there was not a single letter in the printer's font, which, if stamped on the centre of that sheet, would mark the individuality which the progress of intelligence is ever sure to produce. And BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, though great as a statesman, as a philanthropist, as a diplomatist—though great as a traveller, and philosopher, yet he was first and foremost a printer. Upon him which had marked the character of not few of the eminent men of this world. The speaker then adverted to the scientific discoveries of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, by which even now the morning papers were left behind as candidates for the amusement of intelligence, and concluded by eloquently advocating the claims of the printer to the gratitude of the world, and the duty of the community to aid the special objects of the present festival.

Mr. W. H. OAKLEY (late the popular tenor of the Allegheanians) then sang the following song on "Progress," composed for the occasion by S. JOSEPH BANNER, Esq.:

In looking back for five score years, one marks some mighty changes;
In short, such wonders have transpired that nothing more deemed strange is.
Progress (for none in nothing back) makes most tremendous bounds,
And man's invention never flags, but startles with its rushes.

A century since, our FRANKLIN filled a gaping world with wonder,
When he, the Ajax of his day, defied the crashing thunder,—
Taking the flames of heaven in tow, and through a whipcord bringing
Celestial fire from every cloud—a kite could thrust its wing in.

At length the whispered he threw down and on a rod of metal
He caught the welkin's winged fires, in their full sweep, to settle;
In science, thus, the sage became a practical instructor,
Establishing a lightning train in charge of a conductor.

Years passed away, the lightning's flash, (at least its imitation,)
No longer willing to be dumb, essayed articulation;
Stars talked to Stars with tongue of flame, and Science learned to spin its Electric yarns around the globe in less than "fifty minutes."

Ours is an age quite unforetold by fogies dressed prophetic—
An age of steam, daguerreotypes, and intercourse magnetic;
Humbug is shamed by stranger Fact—the genius of Invention
Develops truths to which her lies are quite too tame to mention.

The metal horse was deemed a bit, but what are iron horses
When matched against a "message bird" that goes the pace of Messrs'?
Grey iron hosts our iron steeds; but when thought seems to linger
When the magnetic fluid 'snapes the operator's finger.

The very spirits, it is said, so much have we amused 'em,
Have come to Earth to see what's up—the spectacle has caused 'em;
Though to astonish us resolved, they find they are not able,
And all their resolutions now are left upon the table.

Yet will these modern miracles, we well to throw a mist in,
That the Grand Era of our race dates from the birth of printing;
"Improvement, on the car of Time," can bring no freight more glorious
Than Freedom's Press, which renders Truth o'er Time itself victorious.

Then, live the Press! with FRANKLIN's name, to fame immortal wedded,
The lever of intelligence by which the world is moulded;
Restraining wrong, conserving right, and, spite of fashions' sneers,
Unmasking demagogues and cheats to all who "take the papers."

The Choir then sang a beautiful Chorus, after which PETER C. BAKER, the founder of the Printers' Library, and the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, came forward to speak in behalf of the Free Library.

He said he felt a peculiar satisfaction in the report of the Library, and was fully conscious of the worth of the Free Library, the good which it had done, was doing, and would do, if it was cherished as it ought to be. He was proud to be connected with an institution which was established by a man who was an honor to his country, and had not his fellow in the world. He read the annual report from a letter enclosing a donation of a hundred dollars from Mr. GEORGE BRUCE:

FROM GEORGE BRUCE, ESQ., TYPE FOUNDER.

"* * * I am with you in spirit, and send you a check for $100, to aid the Library, out of your collection which to me gives us to live yet in further claim by reason of my premium made a year since, which was $1,000; the society could raise $9,000, I could be happy to hear from you. Your obedient servant, GEORGE BRUCE."

A collection was then taken up for the benefit of the Library, after which Mr. OAKLEY sang a parody commencing with the words, "I'll sing you a song of a printer boy," &c.

Mr. JAMES BARBOUR came forward and addressed the audience.

He said it was one of the most difficult things in the world to rise under such circumstances as these, when one had nothing to say, more especially as the grand object of the occasion had been attained in, he hoped, a large and satisfactory addition to the Society's funds. He proposed to consider the man whose name was associated with this festival, in his character, as a literary man, as a philosopher, as a legislator, as a diplomat, and as a mechanic. He passed a high eulogy on BENJAMIN FRANKLIN—considered under each of the several phases of mind and character which he had mentioned, and declared him to be the model man—the exemplar of human conduct, and the impersonation of all the best traits of human intellect. His assertion of the necessity for men employed in connection with the Press to acquire a knowledge of general science, of language, ancient and modern, and of universal literature. The best school, he believed, was the printing office; and if he had a son to educate, he would place him as readily in a well-conducted printing office as in the first college in the land. He quoted the well-known lines of POPE:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing—
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

Expressing his coincidence with the sentiment expressed in the first line, there being nothing, he said, more lamentable than to see a man who knew so little that he did not know how little he did know. (Applause.) He (the speaker) believed that while some of FRANKLIN's maxims were too material in their spirit—too much directed to the acquisition of wealth, without considering that happiness was as much a legitimate object for human desire as wealth—yet his greatness in every sphere to which his intellectual energies had been directed, had rendered his name and fame immortal.

Erigat falsum cole, scaptrumque tyrannis.

Mr. BROOKS resumed his seat amid much applause.

Mayor WOOD then read the following dispatch, received from FREDERICK FOLLETT, Esq., an old printer and ex-Canal Commissioner:

To the President of the New-York Typographical Society, Broadway Tabernacle:

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the printer, who called the lightnings from the clouds and made them subservient to his will—the patriot, statesman, sage—he was an ornament to the world—an honor to the Art of Arts.

With the response of FREDERICK FOLLETT.

Mrs. GEORGIANA STEWART then sang with exquisite sweetness, MOORE's beautiful song of "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls."

A grand Hallelujah Chorus was then sung by the Choir.

Col. T. B. THORPE, of Louisiana, next addressed the audience:

He said he had been selected on this occasion to bring up the rear; he was going to speak of the doings of the printers in the war with Mexico. The origin of printing, he said, had created the greatest revolution that had occurred in the history of mankind from the birth of Christ; and, as a manifestation of its significance, the first book that ever was put in print was the Bible. The astonishing similarity in the impressions of the Bible first printed by Mr. FAUST, led the ecclesiastics who examined it to suppose that it was the work of the devil. The devil turned out-spotter! Why the old gentleman would as soon think of boiling himself in holy water. (Laughter and applause.) The speaker then adverted to the early life of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the typographical philosopher, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. (Applause.) There is another object, ladies and gentlemen, which I hope you will also appreciate, which is to aid in the extension and improvement of the Printers' Free Library, for the dissemination of useful knowledge, I may say, throughout the world.

The best school, he believed, was the printing office; and if he had a son to educate, he would place him as readily in a well-conducted printing office as in the first college in the land. He quoted the well-known lines of POPE:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing—
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

Expressing his coincidence with the sentiment expressed in the first line, there being nothing, he said, more lamentable than to see a man who knew so little that he did not know how little he did know. (Applause.) He (the speaker) believed that while some of FRANKLIN's maxims were too material in their spirit—too much directed to the acquisition of wealth, without considering that happiness was as much a legitimate object for human desire as wealth—yet his greatness in every sphere to which his intellectual energies had been directed, had rendered his name and fame immortal.

Erigat falsum cole, sceptrumque tyrannis.

Mr. BROOKS resumed his seat amid much applause.

Mayor WOOD then read the following dispatch, received from FREDERICK FOLLETT, Esq., an old printer and ex-Canal Commissioner:

To the President of the New-York Typographical Society, Broadway Tabernacle:

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the printer, who called the lightnings from the clouds and made them subservient to his will—the patriot, statesman, sage—he was an ornament to the world—an honor to the Art of Arts.

With the response of FREDERICK FOLLETT.

Mrs. GEORGIANA STEWART then sang with exquisite sweetness, MOORE's beautiful song of "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls."

A grand Hallelujah Chorus was then sung by the Choir.

Col. T. B. THORPE, of Louisiana, next addressed the audience:

He said he had been selected on this occasion to bring up the rear; he was going to speak of the doings of the printers in the war with Mexico. The origin of printing, he said, had created the greatest revolution that had occurred in the history of mankind from the birth of Christ; and, as a manifestation of its significance, the first book that ever was put in print was the Bible. The astonishing similarity in the impressions of the Bible first printed by Mr. FAUST, led the ecclesiastics who examined it to suppose that it was the work of the devil. The devil turned outspotter! Why the old gentleman would as soon think of boiling himself in holy water. (Laughter and applause.) The speaker then adverted to the early life of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the typographical philosopher, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. (Applause.) There is another object, ladies and gentlemen, which I hope you will also appreciate, which is to aid in the extension and improvement of the Printers' Free Library, for the dissemination of useful knowledge, I may say, throughout the world.

Rev. LEONARD W. BACON pronounced an appropriate prayer.

The Choir, under the direction of Mr. GEORGE ANDREWS, then executed, in a highly creditable manner, the following Opening Ode, written for the occasion by FRANKLIN J. OTTARSON, Esq., of the New-York Tribune:

When o'er the moral world the pall
That told Religion dead, was flung,
And Superstition's chilling thrall
On God's devoted altars hung,
Then, in the fullness of the time,
There flamed above the fallen earth
Thy glorious star, whose light sublime
Proclaimed the promised Saviour's birth.

A thousand years had waned away,—
The world in mental midnight rolled—
The Age of Darkness and Decay
From memory crushed the Age of Gold,
When, from the void of ignorance,
Flashed out the lightning of the Press—
A heaven-created radiance—
To warn, to comfort and to bless.

And, as from land to land it flew
The longing people blessed the light;
For with it, Freedom o'er them threw
The magic shield of Human Right:
It showed the Tyrant's cowing sword;
It lighted up the Bigot's den;
Hurled down the Kings whom fools adored,
And raised the mass from Slaves, to Men.

Hail to the Press! Forever on,
Its mind-liberating march will be,
Till it shall bring to every one
Of Adam, light and liberty.
Wrought by the tireless arm of Steam,
The Lightnings to its service given,
So may it speak as shall become
The mightiest power under Heaven.

Mr. R. A. WEST then came forward and congratulated the Mayor as presiding, not over a Common Council, but over a combination of intellect-producers and light-diffusers. To illustrate the idea of the power of the press, he had taken a sheet of blank paper, which, as it were, saw nothing, felt nothing, and "knew nothing." (Applause.) It was Native American, although it was true that the rags may have been imported, and "naturalized" at that. (Laughter.) But manufactured, and dull, and black as it was, the printer's devil would turn it into an angel of light in less than five minutes. Why, there was not a single letter in the printer's font, which, if stamped on the centre of that sheet, would mark the individuality which the progress of intelligence is ever sure to produce. And BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, though great as a statesman, as a philanthropist, as a diplomatist—though great as a traveller, and philosopher, yet he was first and foremost a printer. Upon him which had marked the character of not few of the eminent men of this world. The speaker then adverted to the scientific discoveries of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, by which even now the morning papers were left behind as candidates for the amusement of intelligence, and concluded by eloquently advocating the claims of the printer to the gratitude of the world, and the duty of the community to aid the special objects of the present festival.

Mr. W. H. OAKLEY (late the popular tenor of the Allegheanians) then sang the following song on "Progress," composed for the occasion by S. JOSEPH BANNER, Esq.:

In looking back for five score years, one marks some mighty changes;
In short, such wonders have transpired that nothing more deemed strange is.
Progress (for none in nothing back) makes most tremendous bounds,
And man's invention never flags, but startles with its rushes.

A century since, our FRANKLIN filled a gaping world with wonder,
When he, the Ajax of his day, defied the crashing thunder,—
Taking the flames of heaven in tow, and through a whipcord bringing
Celestial fire from every cloud—a kite could thrust its wing in.

At length the whispered he threw down and on a rod of metal
He caught the welkin's winged fires, in their full sweep, to settle;
In science, thus, the sage became a practical instructor,
Establishing a lightning train in charge of a conductor.

Years passed away, the lightning's flash, (at least its imitation,)
No longer willing to be dumb, essayed articulation;
Stars talked to Stars with tongue of flame, and Science learned to spin its Electric yarns around the globe in less than "fifty minutes."

Ours is an age quite unforetold by fogies dressed prophetic—
An age of steam, daguerreotypes, and intercourse magnetic;
Humbug is shamed by stranger Fact—the genius of Invention
Develops truths to which her lies are quite too tame to mention.

The metal horse was deemed a bit, but what are iron horses
When matched against a "message bird" that goes the pace of Messrs'?
Grey iron hosts our iron steeds; but when thought seems to linger
When the magnetic fluid 'snapes the operator's finger.

The very spirits, it is said, so much have we amused 'em,
Have come to Earth to see what's up—the spectacle has caused 'em;
Though to astonish us resolved, they find they are not able,
And all their resolutions now are left upon the table.

Yet will these modern miracles, we well to throw a mist in,
That the Grand Era of our race dates from the birth of printing;
"Improvement, on the car of Time," can bring no freight more glorious
Than Freedom's Press, which renders Truth o'er Time itself victorious.

Then, live the Press! with FRANKLIN's name, to fame immortal wedded,
The lever of intelligence by which the world is moulded;
Restraining wrong, conserving right, and, spite of fashions' sneers,
Unmasking demagogues and cheats to all who "take the papers."

The Choir then sang a beautiful Chorus, after which PETER C. BAKER, the founder of the Printers' Library, and the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, came forward to speak in behalf of the Free Library.

He said he felt a peculiar satisfaction in the report of the Library, and was fully conscious of the worth of the Free Library, the good which it had done, was doing, and would do, if it was cherished as it ought to be. He was proud to be connected with an institution which was established by a man who was an honor to his country, and had not his fellow in the world. He read the annual report from a letter enclosing a donation of a hundred dollars from Mr. GEORGE BRUCE:

FROM GEORGE BRUCE, ESQ., TYPE FOUNDER.

"* * * I am with you in spirit, and send you a check for $100, to aid the Library, out of your collection which to me gives us to live yet in further claim by reason of my premium made a year since, which was $1,000; the society could raise $9,000, I could be happy to hear from you. Your obedient servant, GEORGE BRUCE."

A collection was then taken up for the benefit of the Library, after which Mr. OAKLEY sang a parody commencing with the words, "I'll sing you a song of a printer boy," &c.

Mr. JAMES BARBOUR came forward and addressed the audience.

He said it was one of the most difficult things in the world to rise under such circumstances as these, when one had nothing to say, more especially as the grand object of the occasion had been attained in, he hoped, a large and satisfactory addition to the Society's funds. He proposed to consider the man whose name was associated with this festival, in his character, as a literary man, as a philosopher, as a legislator, as a diplomat, and as a mechanic. He passed a high eulogy on BENJAMIN FRANKLIN—considered under each of the several phases of mind and character which he had mentioned, and declared him to be the model man—the exemplar of human conduct, and the impersonation of all the best traits of human intellect. His assertion of the necessity for men employed in connection with the Press to acquire a knowledge of general science, of language, ancient and modern, and of universal literature. The best school, he believed, was the printing office; and if he had a son to educate, he would place him as readily in a well-conducted printing office as in the first college in the land. He quoted the well-known lines of POPE:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing—
